OUR MISSION

Over 35 years ago, I came to the United States with dreams and hopes, but I distinctively remembered how my parents struggled just to make ends meet. They worked factory and other laborious jobs that had little return.

Marie Thelusma-Chase

In the 21st century, we can offer more to local immigrant populations, the working poor, and other people who seek the American dream. All of the programs at Shiloh CDC focus on one mission: stabilizing families economically, educationally, and socially. This special edition of our newsletter is a window into how Shiloh CDC's workforce development programs are breaking barriers - racial, economic, and physical - so that everyone has a fair chance of increasing their income and improving their quality of life.

Yours truly,

Marie Thelusma-Chase, CFRE
Executive Director

New Jersey Department of Labor - "More than 93 percent of New Jersey residents working in the technology field have achieved some level of college education or higher. Almost 77 percent hold a Bachelor's degree or higher."

Shiloh CDC strategically collaborates with employers, educational institutions, and other nonprofit organizations to develop a pathway for non-college graduates to obtain the industry certifications/skills, and experience needed to compete for jobs in the technology field.

Many of the people completing our eight-week web design and seven-week job readiness programs are changing careers, chronically unemployed, and/or retired. For many, our free web design class is their entry into the graphic design and HTML world.

Our students learn the techniques for developing a website, gain instructions on project management and time management, and more importantly, our students work on developing their first full website.

"I feel confident and I feel good about what I've done by applying the skills that I learned from this class" - Sandra Aviles, 2015 Web Design Graduate (www.freedomfighters.cloudaccess.host)

After graduating the web design class, Sandra is now seeking an internship focusing on her new found craft - graphic and web design. We are also committed to providing scholarships for industry certifications.
